Words of Wisdom

Martyr Khamenei's selected statements

The Americans should know this too that if they start a war, this time it will be a regional war.

Word for Word

When you hear them talking of war at times, claiming they will attack with their aircrafts and so forth, this isn't something new. In the past too, the US [officials] would repeatedly make threats about "all options being on the table." By "all options," they also mean the option of war. They would continuously say, "All options are on the table." Now this man is doing the same thing again, constantly claiming that they've sent aircraft carriers, they've done this and that, and so on. In my opinion, they shouldn't try to intimidate the Iranian nation with such things. The Iranian people aren't affected by this kind of talk. They aren't afraid of standing up for what is right. We aren't the initiators [of war]. We do not seek to oppress anyone. We do not seek to attack any country. However, anyone who shows their greed and seeks to attack or cause harm, will face a decisive blow from the Iranian nation. Of course, the Americans should know this too that if they start a war, this time it will be a regional war.

Memorable Frame

The wise man, as always, spoke with calmness yet with the familiar warmth of his words, addressing both friends and enemies about the future.

In that image, there is no shouting, no commotion—only a face that is calm, yet resolute, with a gaze that seems to have passed through years of experience and storms. His words are simple, yet heavy—not because they are complex, but because they lay bare an unvarnished truth. He speaks of a conflict that appears political on the surface, but in its depth is a clash of wills—a struggle between greed and steadfastness.

His hands move gently, as if he is trying to imprint once more upon minds a concept repeated for years. He speaks of a country others have sought to devour, and of a nation that has stood firm and refused to yield. In his eyes, there is neither fear nor doubt—only a kind of certainty born from faith in a people who have been tested time and again.

That photograph captures a moment where past and future are intertwined—where the memory of past domination meets a warning about present ambitions. He does not underestimate threats, yet he does not fear them; as if he knows that destiny is shaped less by great powers and more by the will of nations.

Looking at that image evokes a strange feeling—a mixture of calm and unease. Calm from his certainty, and unease from what lies beneath his words. For when he speaks of response, he does so not as a slogan, but as a probable reality.

Perhaps this is the secret of the image's impact: a silence in which cries can be heard, and a calmness that conceals within it a storm.

His final warning now stands before our eyes: a regional war.

And now, the regional True Promise...

The Islamic Republic of Iran, with patience, deliberation, and prudence, will advance the plan for a regional offensive against American-Zionist interests.

And now, the regional True Promise! What unfolded from the early afternoon of Saturday, February 28, was the realization of what Iran had promised before: that if the spark of aggression is ignited against Iran, Iran's response will no longer be limited to the geography of the occupied territories, and the Islamic Republic of Iran will consider it a full-fledged regional conflict, and its military and defensive response will be proportional to this regional scale. The Islamic Republic of Iran is committed to observing good neighborliness, but this will not cause Iran to remain bound by formalities if the Zionist-American enemy, using the air, land, and sea of neighbors, fans the flames of aggression against Iran; Iran is committed to what it had promised before: if a war breaks out, Iran's response will be regional.

It was in this context that, without any formality, multiple targets of the American enemy in Qatar, the United Arab Emirates, Bahrain, Saudi Arabia, Jordan, and the Kurdistan Region of Iraq came under Iran's offensive strikes. Tehran does not calibrate the pulse of its defensive and military reactions based on media definitions or hype, which would lead it to be shocked by the skirmishes of the first day of battle. What took place on the first day of battle was only a small part of the arena that was promised earlier and which Iran has designed for the coming days. According to this design, all assets of the US in the region, whether military, civilian, economic, or political, are legitimate targets of Iran's offensive waves.

The Armed Forces, in turn and according to the pre-designed plan, will strike them. At this level, Tehran has no formalities with neighboring and regional countries regarding its national interests. For this reason, it is incumbent upon the authorities of the regional countries to reconsider the type of security and military services they provide to the American-Zionist enemy; otherwise, the continuation of the affair will be the same as what happened in the early afternoon of the first day of battle. The difference, of course, is that the quantity and quality of fire will increase exponentially. For every hour that servicing the American enemy is delayed, the fire will engulf more of those who provide services to the enemy. The other side of the recent arena is the Zionist regime; a regime that was not and is not on par with engaging in conflict with Iran. Therefore, both in the twelve-day war and in the current arena, a significant portion of the lives and equipment of American forces in the region has become a protective shield for this regime. A country like Iran, which has defined its level of conflict with the United States as paralyzing its fleet, grappling with the Zionist regime is a kind of warm-up exercise to fight the main opponent. Unlike the Zionists, who favor swift, short strikes and the matter being concluded once and for all, Tehran is advancing its plan with patience and deliberation.

The level of conflict for the Islamic Republic of Iran in the recent arena is not with the proxy Zionist regime, but with the main employer; the fact that the Zionists also seek to get slapped and, supported by their master, have re-entered the arena, is another matter. The Islamic Republic of Iran had prepared itself for this day. Time will also show how and in what state the parties involved in this arena will exit the conflict. Iran was not the initiator of entering this arena, but now that the Zionist-American enemy has imposed it, it will advance matters with prudence, strength, and without haste. The prerequisite for all of this, however, is maintaining internal cohesion and unity. The strong fist of the Islamic Republic of Iran for managing this regional arena requires the solid ranks of the nation and the people of Iran. It is incumbent upon all elites and those with platforms to strengthen the solid ranks of national unity and make the fist of the Armed Forces even stronger. The Armed Forces of Iran, supported by the nation, have many plans for the American and Zionist aggressors.

A Moment with Caravan of Martyrs

Martyr Dr. Ali Larijani

Ali Larijani was born in 1957 in Najaf into a religious and scholarly family whose roots trace back to Larijan in northern Iran. Raised in Qom, he pursued higher education in computer science at Sharif University of Technology before turning to philosophy, earning his master's and doctorate from University of Tehran. Alongside his academic work, he authored several writings in philosophy, reflecting a deep intellectual grounding.

Larijani's public career began after the Iranian Revolution, initially within the state broadcasting system and later in the Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps, where he rose to senior positions. Over the years, he held key roles including Minister of Culture, head of the national broadcasting organization, Secretary of the Supreme National Security Council, and most prominently, Speaker of Parliament for three consecutive terms.

Following the 12-Day War, he assumed the critical responsibility of Secretary of Iran's Supreme National Security Council. In this short period, alongside Iran's military commanders, he helped design a plan whose results are now visible to the entire world: a regional war. Martyr Ali Larijani guided the early days of the war, and his forceful responses to outspoken Western officials brought his name into the spotlight of international media. During this time, people around the world became familiar with him and his background, admiring him and the country that raised such a man. And after his martyrdom, a wave spread among supporters of the Resistance worldwide, along with a deep regret that they had not come to know him sooner.

Martyr Ali Larijani was killed on March 17, 2026, along with his son and several of his companions, at the hands of the usurping Zionist regime and the US.

Narrating the Art

Its single blazing eye tells the story: power unleashed without limit eventually devours itself.

A scorched American eagle—once the emblem of power and dominance—now rises broken and burning, its feathers charred by the very war it helped ignite. Twisted into a monstrous form, it claws upward from a world set ablaze, its fire spreading across continents. This is no longer a symbol of freedom, but of consequence.

After the United States launched its assault on Iran, the flames did not stay contained. What followed was a regional war—one that spread beyond borders, consuming everything in its path. Now the eagle burns in that same fire, a reflection of escalation turned inward.
